

When Dr. Patricia Kelly makes her rounds, cardiac care ascends to new heights.

Dr. Patricia Kelly carries her love of hiking in the mountains to every patient visit. As a Community cardiologist she knows that, just like at elevation, she is completely self-contained and ready for anything.

Growing up outside Philadelphia, Dr. Kelly spent her childhood vacations in the Poconos. A cross-country runner in high school, she learned early on that mountain trails offered a bigger challenge. After completing her undergraduate degree at Villanova University, she went on to earn her MD at the University of Pennsylvania.

Fascinated by the cardiovascular strength required for mountain ascents, she went on to Harbor UCLA Medical Center for a Cardiology Fellowship, then to Boston to study Electrophysiology at Massachusetts General. Her love of the mountains then called her to the University of Colorado in Denver.

Today she and her husband avidly backpack the high peaks of the world, loving the peaceful assurance of self-reliance she finds there. As a cardiologist, she knows that even in the most dire medical crisis, she has the knowledge and strength she needs to save lives.

We're proud to welcome her into our Community and into our hearts.
